DEPARTMENT OF ENGLISH

Professional Writing Program 2013–2014

The English department's Professional Writing program will teach you the skills you need to succeed as a writer, whether your career path leads you to business, government, industry, science, or a profession. You'll be prepared for today's digital workplace, ready to use new media to solve the problems of professional communication.

If you've declared a major or an honours program in any of the disciplines UVic offers, you're eligible to declare a minor in the English Department's Professional Writing program. You'll combine your knowledge of your discipline with the ability to communicate it to other professionals and to general readers.

Don't worry if you haven't yet declared a minor in the English Department's Professional Writing program. You can still take our courses if you have the prerequisites (see inside). Just register for our courses in the normal way; we welcome students from all faculties and programs across the university.

Admission

Academic Prerequisites

Admission to the program will normally be after your second year; plan on taking the prerequisite as soon as you can. When you register for a course or apply for the minor, you must have an average grade of at least B in the prerequisite writing courses (see below) and a B+ average overall or permission of the Professional Writing Program Adviser.

If you don't meet the admissions requirements for either the program or an individual course, show us what you've done as a writer.

In addition, you must be registered in a major or an honours program at the university. There is no standalone minor in professional writing.

Prerequisites

Before declaring the professional writing minor, you must have any two (i.e., 3 units) of the following courses with a minimum grade of B in each course:

ENGL 115	ENGL 181
ENGL 125	ENGL 215
ENGL 135	ENGL 225
ENGL 145	ECON 225
ENGL 146	ENGR 240
ENGL 147

The Minor Program

You must complete ENGL 303: Copy Editing for Professional Writers (1.5 units) and an additional 7.5 units of courses from those listed below for a minor in professional writing.

Declaring Your Minor

Declare your minor by speaking to an academic adviser. You must also declare a major or an honours program (which you can do first).

Co-op Program

Students in the professional writing minor can join the Humanities, Fine Arts and Professional Writing Co-op. In addition to giving you valuable real world experience, Co-op jobs help finance your education. Contact the University of Victoria Co-op Program for details.

Although we strongly encourage students to join the Co-operative Education program, you're still eligible for the minor if you decide not to.

Courses 2013–14

ENGL 301: REPORT WRITING FOR BUSINESS

Elizabeth Grove-White

In today's rapidly changing workplace, your writing skills have never been more important.

These skills are so important, in fact, that more and more employers in business now use writing tests to screen job applicants. These tests are designed not just to check that you can write correctly, but to show you can write for a range of different readers in language that's clear, concise, and to-the-point.

English 301 will introduce you to many of the documents and reports used in professional and business organizations. You'll learn the difference between formal and informal reports. You'll learn how to write negative news tactfully and how to communicate persuasively. You'll learn effective writing strategies for analyzing and organizing information to inform and convince. You'll learn how to write for different audiences. You'll learn basic presentation skills. You'll be introduced to a range of communication tools to enhance your writing process. You'll experience the advantages and challenges of team writing and research.

Students who've taken this course as part of the English department's professional writing minor in the past three years now use their skills in communication jobs in universities and with the B.C. Government, in Lower Mainland technology companies, in Vancouver Island banks and real estate companies, and in government, non-profit, and advocacy organizations.

ENGL 302: WRITING FOR GOVERNMENT

If your career plans include working for government or in the public sector, the best thing you can do to improve your prospects is to develop strong writing skills. Take a quick look through the job postings for positions in government and you'll see that almost every ad demands excellent written communications skills. Employers know that strong writing skills reflect not just your command of language but also your organizational skills, your attention to detail, your persuasiveness, and your ability to make sense.

English 302 introduces you to the essential skills you'll need to be an efficient and effective government writer, whether you plan to work in government communications or as a professional in a specific ministry. You'll learn to design, plan, and develop documents so that they achieve their purpose concisely and effectively. Through intensive practice, you'll learn to write in a clear, concise, and readable style suitable for both government and public audiences. You'll develop your knowledge of document structure and design, for both print and online publications. You'll learn how to make complex information simple and clear. You'll practise writing briefing notes—one of the most in-demand skills in government—as well as correspondence, policy proposals, and media releases.

The skills and practice highlighted in this course will be of value to you if you are studying in any program that leads to government or public sector work—from nursing, education, health information sciences, and social work to business, political science, history, and many others in the social sciences and humanities. They will also help prepare you to work as a writer in any workplace setting, public or private.

Among the students who've taken this course over the past few years, many now work as communications officers, policy analysts, and government administrators. Others have put their writing skills to good use in the broader public sector and for private businesses.

ENGL 303: COPYEDITING FOR PROFESSIONAL WRITERS

Have you ever stared at a sentence and tried to figure out whether it needed a comma or a semicolon? For that matter, have you ever wondered whether it should be "semicolon" or "semi-colon"? Or maybe you've tried to decide whether someone's title should be capitalized, whether a number should be written as a word or a numeral, whether it should be "all the books" or "all of the books."

If so, ENGL 303 will help you find the answers. Whether you plan to work as a writer or editor, or just want to write better in your university courses, ENGL 303 will help you build a solid foundation of copyediting skills.

The course will help you develop mastery of the standard English used in the Canadian publishing industry, universities, government and the public sector, and corporate communications. You'll learn how to make writing—your own and others'—clear, coherent, consistent, and correct. You'll learn the kinds of questions copyeditors ask and where they find answers. You'll learn how to copyedit electronically as well as how to manually mark up print manuscripts, how to work with authors, how to prepare an editorial style sheet, and how to continue strengthening your copyediting skills once the course is over.

Students who've taken this course have put their skills to work as book editors, in government and corporate communications, as copyeditors of academic journals, and as freelance editors. Here is how one former student, now an award-winning writer for the Globe and Mail, describes the value of the course: "It did more for my resumé in the writing and publishing industry than any other skill or course I've managed to pick up over the years."

ENGL 305: VISUAL RHETORIC FOR PROFESSIONAL WRITERS

TBA

ENGL 305 is an introduction to visual rhetoric as applied to the design of documents. It covers the fundamental concepts and practices of visual design in professional communications for both digital and print media.

As you move from the black-on-white page to the webpage and from the long-document layout to the full-color infographic spread, you will learn how thoughtful visual design carries meaning and supports the purpose of documents.

You will be guided throughout by the three means of rhetorical persuasion—ethos, how the meaningful design of a document reflects its authority; logos, how your design makes explicit the underlying structure of a text; and pathos, how typography, composition, and colour can influence a reader's perception of your document's purpose.

Using Microsoft Office and the Adobe suite of professional design tools (InDesign, DreamWeaver, Illustrator, and PhotoShop), you will learn to work efficiently with advanced formatting techniques. A review of the mechanics of visual perception will inform your use of these tools in the pursuit of visually expressive documents.

By the conclusion of the course, you will have been exposed to common design problems and potential solutions and you will have a better understanding of the constraints and requirements of visual design tasks. This knowledge will enable you to create better documents and to communicate effectively with graphic designers in collaborative environments.

ENGL 401: WEB DESIGN

TBA

Spring 2014

This course introduces you to the technologies and skills required to produce websites in HTML5, CSS3, and WordPress. You'll learn how to use cross-platform tools, terms, processes, and standards with an emphasis on open-source tools and best-practices for web design and implementation.

The course emphasizes professional content and how to create it for the web. meet the course objectives, you'll work on a series of projects and exercises that will develop your skills both as a writer and as a web designer.

ENGL 407: SOCIAL MEDIA & ELECTRONIC COMMUNICATION

Elizabeth Grove-White

Spring 2014

If you follow job posting boards for professional communicators, you already know that social media have become increasingly important in the worlds of commerce, politics, science, education, and the arts.

This course introduces you to the world of social media and immerses you in a social media classroom laboratory where you'll learn to think critically and strategically about current social media.

ENGL 407 gives you new approaches to familiar social media like Facebook and Twitter while introducing you to other tools like social bookmarking, digital mapping, podcasting, and screencasting. You'll get hands-on experience running a weekly blog, organizing online conversations, developing an online identity, and using search engine optimization (SEO).

Because the world of social media changes so rapidly, ENGL 407 will also look behind these digital tools to consider challenges associated with ethical, legal, and privacy issues. Using communication theories, you'll consider the future of computer-assisted communication, particularly the likely uses of emerging trends in mobile computing, place-based and real-time data collection, and the increasing role of online games and simulations in public and private life.

The Professional Writing Minor is an incredible investment. I found the courses relevant, fast-paced, and demanding—the best preparation for life in the working world. Plus, when you finish you have a portfolio of work to back up the PW designation on your degree.

Graduates of this course have gone on to use these skills in communication and public relations jobs for governments and businesses, and several have found work in gaming, content-strategy, and international organizations.

ENGL 412: RESEARCH FOR PROFESSIONAL WRITERS

Susan Doyle

Spring 2014

Never has it been easier to find information. All we have to do is ask Google and we magically have what we're looking for. Or do we? Even as our access to information has been reduced to a simple mouse click, we often struggle harder than ever to find exactly what we need. In the professional world, where inefficient searching wastes time and money, the demand for skilled online researchers is growing. Yet recent research suggests that most undergraduate students have few skills for navigating the expanding universe of online information.

English 412 takes you beyond Google's search box to the world of online databases, archives, newspaper indexes, social media, subject directories, and other searchable sources of information. You'll learn how to search strategically and effectively so that your search time yields the most useful results. You'll learn how to focus your research through effective research questions, how to narrow and refine your strategies, how to evaluate what you find, and how to keep track of your sources as you go. You'll gain practice in performing the research tasks that professional writers perform, and develop expertise in using new research tools, like EverNote, Diigo, and Zotero. You'll also design and pilot a field research task, and produce a complete research plan for a professional writing-based research project.

Although English 412 is not a research methodology course (and does not meet such a program requirement), it will help prepare you for any career that requires strong online research skills as well as improve your research skills as a student.

ENGL 418: PRINT MEDIA GENRES AND TECHNIQUES

Elizabeth Grove-White

Spring 2014

Although digital text and internet media continue to transform the writing workplace, communication professionals still routinely produce print-based documents such as newsletters and media kits.

The ENGL418 professional writing workshop introduces you to widely-used print-based documents associated with professional writing. These include life writing, op-ed writing, news releases and media kits, newsletters and other organizational publications.

As well as introducing you to these formats, the course will focus on writing for different audiences and purposes, understanding readability and usability metrics, and producing print-based documents with maximum visual impact.

Students who have successfully completed this course have gone on to use these skills in public sector communication units, as well as private sector public relations jobs, and in a range of not-for-profit organizations.

My PW minor made me exceptionally attractive to post-grad employers. I was able to secure full-time employment with an above average salary even before graduating. I am 100% convinced that my professional success today is directly linked to the PW and Co-op programs at UVic

Susan Doyle is a professional writer, editor, and curriculum developer, with more than 25 years' experience writing and editing for both public and private sector clients. She has authored BC provincial high school curricula, as well as major reports and public communications for a number of B.C. government ministries. Her instructional materials on writing briefing notes are used by instructors at universities in Canada and the United States, as well as by many Canadian government departments. She has given numerous workshops on effective writing to public sector administrators at the provincial and federal level. She is also an author of textbooks for students from middle school to university, including, most recently, the DK Handbook (Pearson, 2012), a writer's guide for Canadian university and college students.

Susan has been developing and teaching technical and professional writing courses, in the English department and for the School of Public Administration, since 1995.

Kim Shortreed-Webb has worked for the last several years as an instructor, writer, editor, coder, and project manager on the University of Victoria's Colonial Despatches project. On the side, he runs a small business that designs websites for local artists and small businesses.

Kim holds a BA and MA in English, with a minor in Professional Communication from UVic. His graduate studies led him into the field of Digital Humanities, and he has worked with the Humanities Computing and Media Centre, Special Collections at UVic's McPherson Library, and other organizations and people committed to using digital technologies to promote BC's rich history.

Bernard LaVie, a software and graphic designer and educator, has always had a passion for the visual and all things digital. He has designed an award-winning piece of software, and has developed many interactive and multimedia wares and tools, websites and print publications for a variety of purposes and clients.

Bernard holds a BA, MA and post-master's diploma in scientific translation, library science, and computer science from l'Université de Pau et des Pays de l'Adour, France.

After completing her PhD at Trinity College, Dublin, Elizabeth Grove-White moved to Toronto, Canada, where she taught English at the University of Toronto. Following the birth of the first of her four children, she worked as a researcher, writer, editor, and producer at the CBC where she won Canada's first Peabody Award for her documentary "The Longest Journey." She has taught in Ryerson University's writing program as well as working for a variety of print and broadcast media in Canada. Her work has appeared in a range of print and digital formats and she remains a frequent contributor to the Globe and Mail's Books section.

Elizabeth's career-long interest in digital media began during a summer internship as a student reporter with the UK's Computer Weekly newspaper. She has been teaching and researching digital media since 1991 and received SSHRC funding for her digital edition of the Robert Graves Diary in UVic Library's Special Collections. She is currently working with staff from the Humanities Computing and Media Centre and from Trinity College Dublin's Long Room Hub to develop a digital publication engine for diaries and other informational genres.
