Human Being Human

Keynote Address by Dr. Gayatri Chakravorty Spivak (Columbia University)

What is it to be human? Can we be anything else? Something more or less? Are we still, or have we ever been, ‘human’ at all?

These questions only provoke more questions. How do we approach a topic so fundamental to our own existence? Is this the concern of the humanities, social sciences, physical sciences, theology, or the creative arts? Are we to understand the notion of being human as a social construct, political subject, cultural development, or religious modality? Or is it simply something to be experienced and not explained?

Recent theory has destabilized traditional understandings of humanity, challenging notions of the human as a rational animal, political subject, and naturalized body. Emerging in their place are conceptions of humans as fragmented identities, products of discourse, cyborgs. Some ask whether we can even imagine the human in isolation from other animals and the environment. Many find that the questions themselves can be interpreted or interrogated from a plurality of perspectives and methodologies.

We therefore invite interrogations, explorations, and expressions of these seemingly simple considerations to shed light on the nature of the questions themselves, in hopes that we might gain insight into that simple, elusive notion of what it means to be human.

Topics and questions addressed may include but are in no way limited to:

• How can we define the concept of ‘human’?
• Is humanity something performed?
• Technology/cybernetics/genetic enhancement
• ‘Human’ as metaphor
• GMOs
• Racial/racialized identities
• Feminist critiques
• Animality and non-humans

• Emotionality (e.g. grief, empathy, kindness, vulnerability)
• Morality and responsibility
• Imagining the post-human
• Art, creativity, and humanity
• Affect & Power
• Phenomenology of the body
• Prodigies/Genius/Talent
• Inter/subjectivities
