The program is designed to enhance relational, relevant, and transformative education designed to encourage the speaking of Cree within households and cultivate a sense of empowerment. Kakiyosew is dedicated to preserving the Cree language in her community, with the launch of "Nehiyawetan Kikihkinahk" meaning "Let's Speak Cree in the Home". This initiative pairs seasoned mentors with eager mentees, creating an environment for skill-sharing and personal growth. Kakiyosew's vision for mentorship extends beyond mere guidance; it's a project that demonstrates how Indigenous languages and cultures can be used to foster a sense of belonging and pride.

Recently, she spearheaded two remarkable programs aimed at revitalizing Indigenous Teacher Education post-degree candidates. For this six week practicum, the cohort have already been working as language educators in some capacity for years. This is an opportunity to advocate for more sustainable federal funding for Indigenous language work featured on TVO, CBC, and in the Faculty of Health at York University. Stabilizing Indigenous Languages Symposium (SILS)
June 5-7, 2024

Hosted by the NETOLNEW Research Partnership, this year's Stabilizing Indigenous Languages Symposium marks its 30th anniversary, coinciding with the final year of NETOLNEW's seven-year research grant. The symposium brings together a diverse group of Indigenous language scholars, activists, educators, and community members, offering a vital platform for sharing strategies and experiences in Indigenous Language Revitalization. Over three days, participants will engage in keynotes, workshops, and networking, focusing on innovative methods and holistic approaches to sustain and empower Indigenous languages across Canada.
