Abstract

There is a deeply held bias in Northwest Coast scholarly literature that suggests pre-contact Indigenous warfare was primarily made up of surprise 'raids' and ambushes that lacked strong leadership or organization. At the time of contact the Coast Tsimshian Nine Allied Tribes were one of the most powerful polities on the northern coast of what is now British Columbia. A thorough investigation into the pre-contact military history of the Nine Tribes using a combination of oral, archaeological and archival sources to explore battlefield maneuvers in sixteen separate battles will show that Nine Tribes' combat was well organized, had strong leadership, executed complex battlefield maneuvers in coordination with multiple forces, and utilized sophisticated strategies and tactics.
