I also write occasional commentaries and op-ed pieces in newspapers.

In addition to providing a modicum of profile to the university and myself, I regard this work as serving important academic functions. One is that it relates to knowledge transfer, that is, information dissemination and public education through commentaries and analysis. A second function is that working with the media contributes to my own research and learning; it requires staying abreast of events and issues, often placing them in historic and comparative contexts, and in providing opportunities for observations and contacts through my interacting with journalists, representatives of interest groups and think tanks, politicians and bureaucrats, and other academics.

Working with the media can thus be seen as a form of applied research in that, through critical commentary and public analysis, it involves applying existing concepts and developing new interpretations to immediate circumstances and emergent issues and social and political trends.
