Far from destructing the European Union, the euro zone crisis could in reality strengthen it.

By enabling a structure of public space in the EU, the crisis gives more visibility and increases the political role of the latter.

Indeed, by the intermediate of a communication space, the crisis creates democratic sphere, which give new visibility to the European political scene. Our study is based on the medias, as a central dimension of that public space. Finally, we study the European electoral campaign of 2009 (before the euro crisis) and 2014 (during the euro crisis) in France, by comparing the content and the tone of the media coverage of two national broadsheet newspapers (Le Figaro and Le Monde) to measure the structuring effect of the crisis on the European public space.
