

The John Albert Hall Lecture Series presents
Permanent Revolution: Religion and the Canadian Social Order
plenary address by
David Seljak with Anna Greenwood-Lee

Most Canadians believe that public commitments to human rights, multiculturalism, and secularism have settled questions of religious diversity and freedom. David Seljak examines how the growth of non-Christian and non-European Christian religious communities, the resurgence of Indigenous spiritualities, and new forms of spiritual identity and solidarity among the religious “nones” are moving Canada towards a post-secular social order. What might this mean for Canadians and for the church? Seljak argues these are signs of a permanent revolution, presenting secular institutions and traditional religious communities with new challenges—notably around questions of land, law, and reconciliation.
