Contested Care: Stigma, Foreignness, and Reproductive Health in Nigeria

Reproductive health work in Nigeria unfolds in a deeply contested social space shaped by political and religious concerns. I look at one international organization—MSI Nigeria, a key health care provider—that faces intense public scrutiny and stigma both because of its colonial history and the services it provides. Join me as I explore how organizations like MSI navigate public criticism and engage positively with communities seeking reproductive care in a religiously charged environment.

Aminat Muibi is a PhD student in Management at UVic's Gustavson School of Business. Her research focuses on stigma and the ways people and organizations navigate contested environments.
