Finding Hope in Precarity:
Reflections from The Field

Mark McIntyre
PhD candidate, Anthropology, University of Victoria

Monday, March 28th 2022
11:30 am – 12:50 pm
Online – via Zoom

Zoom meeting link and details on the website www.uvic.ca/socialsciences/anthropology/research/colloquium/index.php

Glace Bay (Asikeskuank [Bright Sheet of Water]), a colonial coal mining town on Nova Scotia’s Cape Breton Island (U’nama’kik [Place of Fog]), has been navigating deindustrialization and negotiating precarity for several decades. Since the region’s last major industrial plants (steel and coal) were closed in 2001, Glace Bay and its residents have experienced increased unemployment, out migration and abandonment, drug crises, and general ruination. With an aim to investigate the future orientated problem of hope within precarity, I began fieldwork in Glace Bay in February 2022. In this talk I will introduce you to Glace Bay, as I have been experiencing it, and consider some of the major challenges that residents engage and the tactics that they deploy. Further, I will reflect upon some of the methodologies I have taken up to understand hope in Glace Bay, as well as some of the complications of fieldwork here in 2022.